Section A: Research Methods

www.papaCambridge.com In sociological research quantitative data is often collected. One of the major ways of collecting primary data is by using questionnaires. A questionnaire is a list of questions. The questions are decide in advance and then a sample of people is selected to answer the questionnaire. Questions are of two types: closed and open-ended. Researchers will test their questions by means of a pilot study.

A questionnaire is often chosen over other research methods of data collection because it produces data which is comparable. Questionnaires are also said to produce reliable data because the results obtained can be checked by other researchers using the same questions.

In contrast, qualitative data is collected by sociologists who are interested in studying human interactions and the meanings individuals attach to social situations. They are likely to use unstructured interviews and various forms of observation to gather relevant data.
